

J. H. Sinclair, formerly cashier in the First National bank at this place, arrived here last Friday from Kenmare, where he is in the land business. Jim thinks there is no place like Kenmare but is pleased to get back and see his friends once more. He was a puller for Detroit in the recent world's championship series and was lamenting their loss of the pennant. He was also an interested spectator at the fire, and seemed to be tickled that his old stand—the bank building—was standing the heat and preventing the spreading of the fire in that direction. He left on Saturday for a visit with relatives in Hannaford and other places, before returning to his home at Kenmare.
