Sanborn Enterprise: Pius Stroh shot one of his cows that was exhibiting symptoms of hydrophobia. About a month ago a strange dog came to the Stroh farm and hung around for several days, acting rather queerly but seemingly harmless. On one occasion when the cattle were being driven in one of the cows attacked the dog who bit one of her ears. As the cow was the aggressor Pius thot nothing of it, but a couple of days later shot the dog at the request of his neighbor, Mrs. Diemert, who was afraid of it. On Sunday last the cow began acting queerly and on Monday was running around, bellowing continually, frothing at the mouth, finally attacking one of the men, and to be on the safe side Mr. Stroh shot her. As both of Mr. Stroh's dogs had been bitten by the strange animal he killed them also.
