

FIRST SHAVE IN 60 YEARS

Sharon Banker and Philosopher Had Beard Taken Off.

The following from the Fargo Courier-News will be interesting to many of the Times readers, as Mr. Currie is quite well acquainted in Binford:

One of the episodes in the life of Alexander Currie, banker and philosopher of the town of Sharon, took place in this city this week, and it will be remembered by him so long as life shall last.

He is somewhere near the age of sixty years and this week for the first time in his life, a razor was applied to his face.

This does not mean that he never grew whiskers, or that they were the kind that the Kansas zephyrs could toy with, for he never let them grow long, but kept nipping away at them with a pair of scissors until they were really an adornment rather than a nuisance.

Just what induced Mr. Currie to permit the barber to do his dire work isn't known, but certain it is that for the first time since he grew to man's estate is his face as smooth as that of a one-year-old infant, and he presented a twenty-year younger appearance.

Mr. Currie being a modest man didn't care to go back home minus his whiskers without first apprising his friends and neighbors of the change, and this publication will doubtless have the desired effect.
