

Curtis farm. Wes Flick and son Walter had taken him home in their auto and remained there for some time. Griesinger's bondsman withdrew on July 3rd and he was taken into custody on his former charge, which was for assaulting Mrs. Harding, the wife of his renter.

When retaken the shirt he wore was torn and his arm and breast were scratched, as if he had been in a wire fence, though he claimed to have been in his room in the granary on his farm all the time after the Flicks and Axel Sjokvist, who was also with him the evening before, had left; but he claimed that someone had entered, thrown something into his eyes and taken some of his clothing and his watch.

Investigation of the premises the day of the shooting showed that someone had gone from near the Curtis home across the field north-eastward toward the Greisinger place. The trail, which had evidently been made in the early morning while the dew was on, was clear for considerable distance.

Griesinger was bound over to the district court, bail being fixed in the sum of four thousand dollars, which was furnished, and he was released to appear for trial at the next term.
