

While the wind was blowing a gale on Friday last, the carriage containing the infant child of Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Graham was driven under a team of horses attached to a wagon near by, and before it could be rescued the carriage was kicked into pieces, and strange to say, the baby received only a slight scratch or two. Each time the horses' heels passed over the little one, who appeared to enjoy the situation, judging from its laugh. It certainly was a fortunate escape, and those witnessing the accident were far more frightened than the child.
