

L. O. Larson thinks an automobile is rather an expensive luxury. Someone entered his automobile shed the first of the week and took three inner tubes out of the tires, picked up a grip containing the tools that go with the machine and then took the jack and a can of oil and went off with them. Evidently there was somebody else who had discovered that an automobile was an expensive luxury and thought they would cut down expenses a little. But they will probably find it expensive business before they get through with it.
