

During a thunder storm at Jamestown the latter part of last week lightning struck and killed Gottlieb Klein, an employe of the Russell Miller Milling Co. He had gone to the cupalo of the mill to close a window when the bolt struck and killed him instantly. He was badly burned and fell about twenty feet to the floor. He was an unmarried man and lived with his mother near the mill. Lightning also struck the north side school house and knocked off some shingles and splintered some of the wood work. The janitor was also quite badly stunned but recovered in a short time.
