

Yesterday morning when train 108 reached Wimbledon, Anton Bartosek was driving a team hitched to a load of rock across the track and before he could get out of the way the engine ran into the horses with the result that one of the animals was killed. The animal farthest away from the engine had its front shoes torn off but escaped with a few scratches. Mr. Bartosek got out of the way in time to avoid accident. The team belonged to Gilbert Turter and the animal which was killed was valued at about $150.
