

D. A. Langworthy left Monday evening for Minneapolis where he will spend some time. With the passing of Mr. Langworthy from active farm life in this section of the country passes one of the highly respected and successful pioneers who have seen North Dakota grow from a vast howling wilderness to one of the wealthiest states in the union. In 1883 he took up a homestead north of what is now Courtenay and has resided on the land ever since and has added to his possessions until he sold to Mr. Jones a short time ago a section and a half of as fine land as there is in the state of North Dakota. He is a scientific farmer and probably raised the best crops one year with another of any farmer in the neighborhood. He prided himself in having everything about the farm in first class condition and his barn yard was at all times as clean as a floor and everything about the premises in perfect order. He is now in a position to take life easy and let the burden of managing this large farm fall on younger shoulders.
