

---

The head of a young dog, belonging to W. P. Clark, which recently died in a peculiar manner, was sent to the Agricultural College at Fargo for examination, some being under the belief that the canine was afflicted with rabies. Prof. L. Van Es, who made the examination, replied in a letter upon Mr. Clark's request that though the head of the animal had gone through a stage of putrification, making the examination difficult, he had found no traces of hydrophobia and the dog had died probably from some other disease with symptoms similar to the real rabies.

1