

Hans P. Fuglstad, a prosperous farmer living north of town, related to a Gazette reporter that an airship had been seen to pass in that vicinity going in a westerly direction, the latter part of last week. We have failed to learn of any strange visitors of the air going through this territory, at least no such intelligence can be learned through the state press after a careful perusal. The gentleman's veracity, however, being unquestioned, the possibility is not excluded that the aerial navigator came from foreign lands. The sign board on the rudder, like McCormick and New Deering on a self binder wind shield, may possibly have given its original starting point. Had he looked closer he might have been able to decipher the name of Mars, Saturn or Gee Whiz Jupiter. As it is, the origin is still shrouded in mystery and we may never learn whether the aerial contrivance was a mono-plane, bi-plane, or, imagination.
