

Nearly Overcome by Gas

Max, N. D., 25.—Both of them nearly overcome by coal gas, with which their home had become filled, Mr. and Mrs. Riebe were obliged to go directly from their beds into the cold night air to save themselves. It was about midnight when Mrs. Riebe was awakened, only to find herself greatly weakened. She finally managed to awaken her husband, and it was with much difficulty that they were able to get to the outside door to the fresh air. A lid in the kitchen stove had become dislodged by a strong draft and was responsible for the affair.
