

Mr. and Mrs. Bartlett narrowly escaped suffocation from coal gas Monday morning. The pipe on the chimney had become broken down during the recent storms and the wind being in a certain quarter prevented the gas from going up the chimney and consequently it was driven down the chimney and into the rooms. Mrs. Bartlett woke up about 4 o'clock and smelled the gas and was partly under its influence at that time. The rooms were aired and the stove appeared all right and Mr. and Mrs. Bartlett went back to bed, but the gas again escaped and the fact that Mr. Bartlett was going away early on the train again saved them as he got up early and both were getting well under the influence of the deadly gas when he awoke the second time. Both Mr. and Mrs. Bartlett were sick all that day from the effects of the gas.
