

A peculiarly sad and distressing accident took place at Lars Warberg's during his absence last week. He had gone to a wedding at Fingal, leaving the place in charge of his hired man Nels Austad. About 3 in the morning the roof caught fire and got under good headway before it was discovered. Ed. Ever-son's brother who was spending the night with Austad started for help, warning him not to attempt to save anything from the building but he evidently did, for when they returned he was not to be found, and after the fire had gone out his bones were found in the ruins. They were shipped to his home in Wiscon-
