

Carl Haase, a brakeman on the branch, was killed at Jamestown Saturday evening. He started for that city to spend Christmas with friends, and it is supposed that when he jumped from the train the strong wind which prevailed at the time carried him under the wheels, which passed over his body, severing it in twain. Carl had many friends and was well liked, and one of the saddest features of his untimely death was that he was to have been married to a young lady of Jamestown in a few days — Enterprise.
