

A few weeks ago we had a brief account of the death of Olaf Sahl at Moose Jaw, Sask., but since then have received further particulars. He was taken sick by what the doctors called a mild attack of typhoid fever, but it changed to a malignant form and he died Sunday, Sept. 6. His brother Arthur was with him during his last illness and his mother and his brother Martin were on the way from Kenyon to Canada when