Ernest and Lester Kjelson had an experience Tuesday night which came near costing them their lives, and from which they are fortunate in escaping without any serious consequences. They have a sleeping room fitted up in a small building near the house, and before retiring had banked their fire with briquettes, evidently closing the drafts too tight. As a result the room became filled with gas fumes after they had gone to sleep. They were not able to arouse themselves enough to get out of the room, so were found unconscious by the parents the next morning. The boys were carried into the house, and a doctor summoned at once from Cooperstown, and in the course of a few hours they were pretty well revived.
