

Ole L. Fogderud, of Fairmead, Cal., who is here to look after his farm interests, was a caller at the Enterprise office last Tuesday. • He reports that the hay crop was a failure in California this year, and as he had entered into the business of raising stock, he will be forced to sell some of his stock at a sacrifice, as to buy hay for them is too expensive at the present price of alfalfa—which is the hay crop in California—and which is now nearly $25 per ton. He was also unfortunate in that his farm west of Hannaford was in the tract destroyed by hail this summer, so the yield will hardly pay expenses. It is to be hoped that he will have better luck next year.
