

W. D. Sinclair had a narrow escape from being run into by the next passenger train last Saturday. He was walking along the depot platform away from the train when he stepped off the end of the platform and onto the track to cross it on his way home for dinner. Just as he stepped onto the track the engine came right on him, and it was only by grabbing hold of the front of the train that he was able to save himself from injury. Fortunately at that point the train was almost at a standstill, so he was able to extricate himself from his dangerous position without any injury.
