

Soren Krag, formerly a clerk at the Hannaford Mercantile Store, now with the American Expeditionary Force in France, writes to a friend in Hannaford and says among other things: "We have gone through a lot of country since we got here and have seen some of the largest cities in France and England. I have been in three different camps since I came to France. Coming out here we rode in box cars for two days and nights and it was pretty tiresome because we could not lay down and sleep. We are now ready to move again, but this time we won't move to any camp but to No Man's Land. I expect it will be a funny feeling for us, but we are all willing and glad to go. We have the full equipment, gas masks, helmets and oversea cap. We are not using the hat that is worn in
