Paralyzed the Waiter.

Four men walked solemnly into the restaurant, bowed to the waiter gravely, and sat down at one of his tables. He rubbed his napkin over it rapidly, smiled all round, leaned back with his hand on his hip, and said cheerfully:

"Well gents, what is it? Somethin' good?"

"Yes," said the most solemn-looking man in the party; "I'll have some—"

"Yessir; certainly, sir, right away, sir."

"And see here," interrupted another man. "I want mine well done, do you understand? And bring me some anchovy sauce with it, and make that two bottles instead of one."

"Yessir; certainly, sir. What—"

"Be sure and have the tails on mine," remarked the third man confidentially to the waiter, "and have the heads stewed in butter before you bring them."

"Well," growled the fourth man in a deep voice, "why don't you bring the things and not stand looking at us? Hurry up, get away!"

"Ye—ye—ye—yessir." He looked a bit pathetically at the four solemn men and then hurried down to the other end of the room. Here he thought very hard for a long while, and glanced back apprehensively at the men, who stared at him with all the visible signs of anger. The head waiter asked him what he was standing around about, and the cooks laughed at him. Then he came back very obsequiously and said:

"You'll excuse me, gents, but I didn't quite get that order."

Upon this the solemn man exhibited the most intense annoyance. "I told you eight distinct times," he said, speaking very rapidly, while the others chorused in at intervals, "to bring me some stewed oysters fried on toasted half shells, with mushrooms and $2 worth of soap, along with some buck-wheat cakes frappe, mulligatawny soup with brass nails, half of a porterhouse chicken—"

"Ye—ye—yessir."

"And paper collars with beveled edges."

"But," yelled the waiter, "we haven't got 'em."

"Haven't got oysters," and the man jumped to his feet, "nor chickens, nor toast? Well, what sort of a restaurant is this, anyhow?"

With which the four men overwhelmed the waiter with reproaches and quit the house.—New York Sun.
