An Old Soldier,

India being in the focus of public attention, the experience of our townsman, Joseph Allen, in that country is not without interest. We asked Joe to tell us what he knew about India, for the benefit of the COURIER, and the following conversation developed:

"Well, I know considerable about India. How much space do you want to take up?"

"About half a column."

"Ten years of a man's life in half a column! You must think life in Bengal is like solitary confinement in the penitentiary, where the only events are going crazy and dying."

"You were in the English army?" "I was, for ten years. I was born in The Indian mutiny was then raging. Then we went to the relief of Cownpore. The Sepoys, under Nana Sahib had been A. "After the relief of Lucknow, the Eighty-fourth was formed into a camel corps—two men on a camel. I traveled on camel back nine months. When engaged in battle our camels knelt in a circle, and we used them as a bulk work. The riding on camel back is rough, till you get used to it.

"It is a hot country. The winter is hotter than our summer; during the monsoons it rains all the time for about three months. The war lasted two years. After that, we went up in the Himalayas to a pretty little town called Darjeling, 21,000 feet above the sealevel. We were in the clouds. We were right under Mt. Everest, and another high mountain, covered with perpetual snow. At Darjeling there were coffee and tea plantations.
