A Poet On an Editor.

[W. J. Henderson, in Puck.]

Let us go hence, my song; he will not hear,
Let us go hence, he corks up his ear.
Keep silence now, for singing time is over,
And over once for all for us, I fear;
So let us eat a sad, consoling dove, or
Seek successe of sorrow in cold beer;
He would not hear.

Let us come off and drop; he will not care;
He's filled his columns, and has stuff to spare;
He writes it all himself—it's pretty tart;
But then it saves him money. "Then't fair
That he for hungry scribes should kill the mart,
And leave us grubless in the murky air;
But he don't care.

Let us rise up and skip; he will not know.
Let us go beanward, as the great tramps go.
Full of Swiss cheese and foam. What helps here?

There is no help, for me there is no show,
And all the world is bitter as a tear.
The editor is fly on songs of woe;
They are no go.

A Story in a Bottle.

A farmer of Miller, Dakota, found an old yellow scrap of paper on his claim, in a bottle, tightly corked, bearing the following: "Monday, July 1, 1861—My name is Sam Black, and I am going to die. I was wounded at Big Lake first, then I ran to the hills, where the Indians caught me and left me for dead right here. I have lots of money, and I put it under this rock—$4,000. I am getting weak. When you get this think of Sam Black. Iowa was my home." The above letter was a badly written and badly spelled epistle. The lake referred to is now called Wall lake. The hills are called Ree hills, and were a rendezvous for the hostile Indians in those times.—Exchange.
