The Inkster Murder.

There is a growing impression that Miller's—the Inkster murderer's—dying confession, implicating Rutherford, is true. About the time of the murder he was hauling wheat to Inkster with Miller, and passed the Snell house three times a day, and yet he states that for three or four days after the murder he did not notice anything wrong about the house, not missing Miller, nor observing that there was no fire nor any signs of life. He even left mail there one day during that time. When he did note the quietude, and found the stock in the stable were suffering from their long fast he would not enter the house, but looked up other parties, and induced them to go and see what was the matter. He would not enter the house then, nor at the inquest, nor go near it since. Miller spoke of a false mustache, but Rutherford denies that he had one. It is said that one has since been found in his trunk. These statements are derived from reliable officials of Grand Forks county, and are developing public sentiment strongly adverse to Rutherford. Miller was hardly more than a boy, and was easily controlled by others.

Leland Stanford, the railroad magnate, probably the wealthiest man on the Pacific coast, builds him a monument in the University, with an endowment of $3,500,000. Sharon dies a beggar, after transferring to his relatives property to the value of $10,000,000. Both are disappointed men,—one in the death of his only child, the other in the nasty conduct of his mistress. This should teach us all a lesson of one kind or another. If it will teach the old settler we have referred to before, to come up and get the Courier and Farm, Stock & Home for $2 per annum, the aforesaid parties will not have lived and died in vain.

Huron has laid Pierre out cold in the race for the South Dakota capital. If the latter is a true Dakota town she will make haste to discover that the whole state business is a failure.—Lakota Progress and Chronicle
