She Had Seen Her Before.

Passengers on the west side of a down train on the Sixth avenue elevated road yesterday morning caught glimpses of something that excited a brief but lively interest, at least among the baldheaded men aboard. A large front window of the fitting room of a dressmaker's establishment on the second floor was wide open, and inside appeared a lady about trying on a dress in apparent unconsciousness that anybody could see her. She had on white skirts, starched, flounced and ruffled; a little black silk corset of the kind women wear, with full dress costumes, and over each shoulder lay a little band of filmy, lace-like material. The back of her right shoulder was toward the window, and she was looking toward the back of the room, as if waiting for an attendant to hand to her the dress that was to hide those round arms and gleaming shoulders. It was surprising how suddenly and unanimously the men on the west side of the train saw her.

"Rather pretty free show, that," commented a passenger to the saturnine guard, as he stood waiting for the opening of the gate at the next station.

"Yah!" snarled the guard, in a tone of disgust, "I was ketchin' on dat wunst, meself. She's wax."—New York Sun.

Nearing Civilization.

"Begorra, I must be gittin' amongst friends. O've been walkin' the entire mornin' an' that's the first sign of civilization O've met wid."—The Judge.

The College.

"Where is the college building, John?" asked an old man who was visiting his son in one of the college towns.

"Right over there, father," replied the youth, pointing to a large stone building. "Humbone building, isn't it?"

"Very. Would you mind taking me over? I'd like to look inside."

"Certainly not. I guess some of the boys are at work there now. Come right along, and I'll show you Bill Jones, our champion oarsman."

The old man wandered about the building for a while, and then said: "This doesn't seem to me much like a college. John, it seems more like a gymnasium, and all there is to it."

"Well, this is the principal building. Of course, we have a few other buildings."

"Have you any recitation and lecture rooms? I want to see them."

"Um—ah—yes, I tell you there are some sum wings. If you want to see them I'll ask some boys to show us the way. I thought you wanted to see the college itself."—Chicago Rambler.

A TWILIGHT FANTASY.

A woman stood at a garden gate (she had been for the day and night) she lay on the log that leaned by. With a bothered mind.

A man came and he looked over the fence (she had been waiting for him since) "Why haven't you come, mother?" "I haven't," said she.

"To see you come, pink."
